Government to Work with Non-profits for Green Initiatives By E&E News Service Federal agencies plan to work with other agencies and nonprofit groups to bring energy savings and other environmentally friendly practices into the federal work force. An interagency Working Group on Building Sustainability, an outgrowth of the Greening Government Initiative, will kick off Thursday with a speech from Department of Energy Secretary Steven Chu. On Wednesday, the General Services Administration announced the creation of a Building Sustainability Council, and EPA released a plan for making federal buildings more efficient. The Greening Government Initiative, announced last year by President Barack Obama and launched with an executive order, will call for federal agencies to adopt a number of green practices -- such as encouraging the use of energy-efficient technologies and coordinating green procurement programs. The initiative also calls for agencies to reduce the environmental impact of their operations and carry out workforce training to help the agency reduce its waste. In addition to the Working Group, various agencies and outside groups have been working on greening the federal workplace for months, said an EPA official. Among the groups involved are the General Services Administration, Department of Energy, Department of the Interior, Department of Defense, Department of State, Office of Management and Budget, Department of Homeland Security, Department of Justice and EPA. Chu, at the opening of the Greening Government Initiative's Working Group on Building Sustainability, said that while federal agencies have the responsibility of ensuring that the taxpayer's dollars are being used efficiently and effectively, they can also lead the way in making federal buildings more efficient. "While there is no silver bullet for greening government, the federal government can be a driving force in that process," Chu said. "This Working Group will help to create a stronger partnership to implement green building strategies across the government, while also helping to preserve energy, reduce water use, improve air quality, and reduce carbon emissions." "This Working Group will help the government to increase its use of renewable energy, decrease its reliance on fossil fuels, and reduce the environmental impact of government operations," said EPA Administrator
