Search form You are here Criminalizing the Invisible War More than 100,000 women and girls have been raped during military operations and the aftermath of war. While sexual violence is criminalized under human rights and humanitarian law, women and girls who experience sexual violence may face the additional stress of criminalization. The increase in recent years of massive loss of human life during wars – the “Invisible War” – has been accompanied by violence towards women, in particular sexual violence. This “invisible war” has resulted in an estimated 16,000-19,000 women raped per year during military operations (Doll). While sexual violence is illegal under the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) (Amnesty International 2014), its consequences are not always well understood, and may go unreported as a result of stigma, fear of repercussions, or gender inequality in society (Amnesty International 2014). Only a few women who experience sexual violence are charged under human rights or humanitarian law standards. Most women are charged under the national criminal code, under provisions that specifically exclude 3ef4e8ef8d
