Since the code below, input = webcam.getInputStream(); BufferedReader inputReader = new BufferedReader(new InputStreamReader(input)); ...will block the entire application for as long as it is running, I am wondering whether there is a way to only keep the application 'awake' if the webcam input is needed? I have done some research, and found this useful question: Multithreading InputStream in Java But I still need to know what would be the best input device to use. I tried the webcam, but I can't get the stream in the above form. EDIT: I am developing in Eclipse and will be using webcam for now. I don't need to convert the image into a bitmap. A: You need to specify InputStream, that can be read into byte array, and provided to the BufferedReader. And it's enough if you just open it once. It's not needed to run the reader constantly. I found that the Webcam support in Java (through the opencv library) can be extremely poor in quality. In some cases when the application is running the image looks blurred and looks bad. There is another solution which is to use JavaCV, which is well documented and simple to use. It's the only simple solution I have found, it just requires the opencv library to be installed on the machine. 2d92ce491b
