Some physiological differences in women, such as decreased kidney function and increased cardiovascular reactivity to stress and salt intake, might explain this sex difference. This study was designed to determine whether sex differences in blood pressure and vascular reactivity to sodium intake are present in normotensive and hypertensive individuals. We measured blood pressure and vascular function in 10 normal women and 10 normal men. Then, after a 3-week period of dietary sodium restriction, we reassessed blood pressure and vascular function. There were no differences in systolic and diastolic blood pressures or pulse pressure between men and women. There were no differences in sodium intake between men and women, but systolic and diastolic blood pressures decreased significantly after 3 weeks of sodium restriction in women only. The blood pressure response to sublingual nitroglycerin (NTG), a measure of endothelium-dependent vascular reactivity, was similar in men and women at the beginning of the study. However, NTG-induced increase in blood flow in the forearm was significantly greater in women than in men. These data indicate that sex differences exist in blood pressure responses to salt intake and endothelium-dependent vasodilation.Q: Ext
