The mechanical and chemical signals provided in the early stages of bone healing are essential for remodeling and the ultimate calcification of the bone tissue. In particular, the need for strength at a critical site of attachment might be one of the major reasons why it is difficult to repair large bone defects. In this study, two different healing environments were established in vitro. (1) The experiment on the femoral part of a canine tibia with a delayed-implanted intramedullary pin placed after 20 days of healing to further delay healing and (2) a model of delayed cancellous bone-on-bone healing. The influence of mechanical loading, surface coating (collagen-coated, hydroxyapatite-coated, uncoated) on the applied in vitro forces to the bone tissue was evaluated by measuring the stiffness of the whole cross-section of the canine bone model, during the different healing stages. The compression stress resulted in a significantly increased stiffness in the whole cross-section during the active remodeling phase of the bone healing, which indicates the role of compression and tension stress in early-stage healing of bone tissue.
