

This is the first major gameplay feature in which the developers are using a real-time engine that enhances the speed, accuracy and responsiveness of physical gameplay. "With the HyperMotion Engine, we were able to feel the crucial elements of a complete football match in front of our eyes," explained Creative Director Matt Prior. "So we were able to see how it felt to be tackled, how you feel on the ball when you have a chance to pass, and how to beat your opponent in close combat." Here's a video that shows it in action. The new motion capture system works using a set of cameras aimed at the body, which, when combined with the data from the Real Player Motion System, allowed the developers to feel and hear the player's movements in real time, allowing them to feel each collision and display more realistic animations. "The system captures the player's running footsteps, so we could see how a player pushes off the ball at every step, and the player's acceleration upon receiving a pass," said Analyst Peter Ristic, the lead technical producer for the game. "The way the system works to capture and synthesize this movement, meant that we were able to feel the player's elusiveness, and how to react to the player's movement." The presentation of motion capture is not a new technology, and developers have had the tools to make this style of presentation for years. What is new is that the technology is now being applied to larger and more complex problems, so that the user can feel the movements of the player. FIFA 20 introduced the Real Player Motion System, which uses a depth sensor to extract player positions and allows the game to animate the characters involved in the action in a more natural way. EA Sports also introduced motion capture in FIFA 17 with the Reveal Flowzones on the shoulders of players and body parts, like a near-infrared light system. EA Sports added a new feature to its motion capture system last year called Motion Sync, which allows players to share their data in other game modes such as Madden NFL 20. And last October, EA Sports added more motion capture to its sports titles by adding a collaboration feature called Battlefields and adding a more personalized experience through the many ways you can play the game. Developers always used motion capture to make the animations more lifelike in real-time games like EA Sports' Burn
