Electrophoresis and impedance spectroscopy are widely used to characterize biological, chemical, and mechanical samples. Herein, we introduce microfluidic electrophoresis and impedance spectroscopy. Optical tracking of micro-objects is incorporated with the use of high-speed microscopy and a custom-designed sample holder. A close-packed, photolithographically patterned glass chip is used to confine the micro-objects while passing an electric current. A custom high-speed imager is used to monitor the movement of the micro-objects over time. The devices, developed by combining the advantages of laser tweezers and the high-throughput capabilities of microfluidics, have demonstrated the ability to capture, manipulate, and characterize micro-objects. Initial studies suggest that the microfluidic devices can be used for the separation of molecules and ions in sub-micron channels.Effectiveness of various osteoinductive materials in filling tibial defects in rabbits. This study was undertaken to evaluate the effectiveness of 1, 2, and 4% bovine bone, demineralized bone matrix, and autogenous corticocancellous
