Considerable progress has been made in the last decade in our understanding of the importance of mastitis and its sequelae in the health and production of dairy cows. The response of cows to experimental intramammary infection provides the foundation for the development of a "two-stage" or "three-stage" etiologic classification of mastitis. In the first stage, the etiology and pathophysiology of infection are identified by localized examination of subclinical intramammary infections and detection of antimicrobial-resistant bacteria in apparently healthy cows. In the second stage, the response of apparently healthy cows to infection and their impact on the health and productivity of the herd are determined by random or directed sampling of both apparently healthy and mastitic cows. In the final stage of mastitis recognition, the effect of mastitis on the cow is determined by a detailed examination of cows in which mastitis is present and the type, duration, and severity of mastitis. It is hoped that these three-stage etiologic classifications will provide a framework for the continued development of effective mastitis control programs for dairy herds.The relatively new Booting team has been quietly being "rocking" the Internet community for quite some time. This Kickstarter funded team has certainly been releasing some amazing content and their videos and articles have been read and followed by almost all hardcore G.I. Joe fans. In addition, their version of the G.I. Joe vs Cobra Comic book is a classic and all the serious action fans have been waiting for. The team has organized two highly successful conventions: Atlanta Con "GIO" and "Maximum Mayhem" in October and November, respectively. The team is most certainly committed to their fans in every way possible and have plans to continue their work for many years to come. The team's latest endeavor has been the Cobra Supply Crate. The details of
